Well-Mannered Children. "Thank you, Charley," said Mrs.
Brown, as her little son handed her a paper he was requested to bring.
"Thank you Bridget," said the little fellow, a few hours after, as he received a glass of water from the nurse.

"Well Mrs. Brown, you have the best mannered children I ever saw," said a neighbor. "I should be thankful if mine were as polite to me as yours are to the servants. You never spend half as much time on your children's clothes as I do, and yet every one notices them, they are so well behaved."
"We always try to treat our children politely," was the quiet reply.

This was the whole secret. When I hear parents grumbling about the ill-manners of their children, I always wish to ask, have you always treated them with politeness?" I once knew a man, considered quite a gentleman in society, who would speak to his children in a manner that a well-instructed dog would resent. He would order them with a growt to bring his slippers or perform some other little service; and yet he complained of the rudeness and solvedience of his children.

Farm Life.

A writer in Scribner's Magazine asserts that the farmer, having the most sane and natural occupation, ought to find life pleasant. He alone, strictly peaking, has a home. How can a man take root and thrive without land? He writes his history upon his field. How many ties, resources he has; his friendships with his cattle, his team, his dog, his trees, the satisfaction in his growing crops, in his improved fields; his intimacy with nature, with bird and beast, and with the quickening elemental forces; his co-operations with the cloud. the sun, the seasons, heat, wind, rain, frost. Nothing will take the various social distempers which the city and artificial life breed, out of a mag tike ferming, like direct and loving contact with the soil. It draws out the poison. It humbles him. Teaches him patience and reverence, and restores the proper tone to his system. Cling to the farm, make much of it, put yourself into it, bestow your heart and your brain upon it, so that it shall savor of you and radiate your virtue after your day's work is

Some Habits of Portuguese.

The Portuguese are not a clean people, which may be one of the causes of Enghish repugnance to them. Some of their customs are very nasty. They expectorate continually, and before doing so make a horrible, long-drawn, whirling noise up the threat, which is very annoying. They seem to do this once in every two or three minutes, and make quite an art of it; for little boys practice it, and young men seem to take pride in doing it well. There is a great deal of hatwell. There is a great deal of hat-lifting to one another among the men, and from observation I should say that the ert of expectoration, with the prop-er noise, and the art of lifting the hat, were the two things that the native male youth of Maderia first learned. The presence of a hady does not deter the from the former nasty habit, and the Portnemese belies have been and the Portuguese ladies have been known to indulge in it also, as they hang over the balconies, so that it is well to keep the middle of the street in walking. There is a small promenade called the Praca, laid out with trees and seats, where a band occasionally plays. The English soldon frequent it, but the Portuguese gather there, the men in troups together, and the women in groups. The horrible noises and expectorations going on around one there is sickening. The ban? may be termed a performance on drums and cymbals with an acompaniment of wind instruments, for the Portuguese love a noise.

It is a singular fact that not one of the imperial Napoleons has died in France, or on French soil. Napoleon I., the founder of the family, died a prisoner on the British island of St. Helena, in the South Atlantic Geen; his son, Napoleon II., died in Austria; his nephew, Napoleon 111., died an exile in England, and his grandnephew, the young man whom the Free-h imperialists hoped would one day rule France as Napoleon IV., met his fate at the poir of Lulu speara in Son h Africa,

Its ingredients are so skilfully combined, that the full alterative effect of each is assured, and while it is so mild as to be harmless even to children, It is still so effectual as to purge out from the system those impurities and corruptions which develop into loathsome disease. More than half the soil of the unifed kingdom is a minally owned by some 2,000 versons. According to a valuable analysis of the very ill-arranged and in-complete parliamentary return of the land owners of the United Kingdom, published in the Financial Reform Record. for 1878, 421 persons are the owners of 22880,755 peres, or nearly 5,000,000 acres more than one-fourth of the total area of the United Kingdom. The mind is unable to grasp what such a monoply costs the country, but certain features of it stand forth with a prominence sufficiently notable. In a most absolute sense, the well-heing of the entire population of some 32,600,000 souls is placed in the power of a few thousands. For these thousands the multitude toils, and it may be on occasions, starves. Hence it is that all through rural England we have continually before us that most saddening of all spectacles, two or three families living in great splendor, and hard by their gates the miserably poor, the abject slaves of the soil, whose sole hope in life is too often the workhouse—that famous device against revolution, paid for by the middle classes—and the panper's grave. Our land-owners have not merely burdened the land with their game preserves; they have tied it up, and actively conspired to prevent its due cultivation. Instead of rising to the true accessities of the case, they cling to their game, make penal enact-ments about it, and struggle to augment ments about it, and strangle to augment the intensity of the eryl, which it is to the people, as if the very existence of the country depend on hares and rabbits. In his absolute supremacy the had-owner overrides all justice, takes prece-dence of all ordinary creditors on his helpless temants' estates, and controls the system of cultivation, often in utler discovered of private rights or private diaregard of private rights or private adgment, and, in addition, secures to himself the absolute reversion of every improvement which the tenant may make on the land,—Macmillian's Maga-
